Servers are the first line of service to food and beverage customers, taking orders, delivering food and cleaning and resetting tables later. Whether it's a full-service restaurant or a casual dining room, you're a smiling, priceless messenger of deliciousness. Make sure the order is correct, the food comes out quickly, has enough of the icing, and can in a napkin with soft mouse, knife and spoon. How much do servers earn? Depends on the type of job you get. Some server deals are paid at a flat rate and earn advice from clients who are either together and divided by all servers that work or keep the individual. The Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) says that in 2010, the median wage for waiters and waitresses was $8.81 an hour, including tips, or $18,330 a year. For combined food preparation and serving workers, as you would find in a fast-food restaurant, the median income was $8.63 an hour. WHAT ARE THE EDUCATION REQUIREMENTS? To get started as an entry-level server, you don't need an education, and a lot of what you're going to learn is going to be done at work. You may need to be 18 or over to serve alcohol, depending on the condition. Higher end restaurants can offer you more training, and you can seek other vocational training at commercial schools and restaurant associations to advance your career. SKILLS AND REQUIREMENTS FOR WORK Communication skills: Communication is key to server business. You'll have to listen to the customer's order, download it to the chefs, tell your customers about specials and more. To create an excellent dining experience for customers, you will need excellent listening and speaking skills. Customer service: A disgruntled customer will not tip. Friendly, relaxing friendly, courtesy and quick service will help you get multiple customers. Good memory: big, complicated orders happen. You'll need to remember the food and drink specials, what food is the kitchen from this week, who ordered what, and that kid at table 16 still needs a filled root beer. A great memory will help. Endurance: Long, busy days on your feet are a trademark of server service. Teamwork: Servers are part of the team. You will work with other servers, busboys, barts and chefs to make a great dining experience. Being a team player is essential. No one wants their food delivered to them. If you're clean and clean when you're serving food and drink, you'll help your customers create an excellent first impression. THE FUTURE OF SERVERS with more people eating options for input, self-service and implementation will grow at a slower pace than average over the next 10 years. Looking for a job? Find Jobs.
